These two gems from the series feature incredible footage of these rare, beautiful and magnificent big cats. "Expect everything from underwater elephants to mountains of guano and a snow leopard in attack mode? Pure Class"-- The Guardian Review Not only is Planet Earth one of the most jaw-dropping, ambitious, nature documentaries the BBC has ever produced, it's now taken on another role: as a superb demonstration disc for the strength of and Blu-ray. Spread over a good ten hours, the series charts life and nature in dozens upon dozens of differing locations around the earth. Diligently and warmly narrated by Sir David Attenborough, Planet Earth calmly goes close in on its subject matter when required, and then pulls out some stunning perspective shots that are simply breath-taking. It's hard to come up with the right superlatives to do the photography on the programme and the justice, and the carrier has the fascinating story of the matter is a real gem. And I think the original broadcast of Planet Earth was something special if you were shocked by the images already on DVD, but not until you see the 1080i Blu-ray. Particularly in the broadcast, you can't see it without a camera, and it's a real reward for those who have invested in the use of their high definition technology. Presented over five discs, and matching wonderful content to spot-on visual presentation, Planet Earth is now not just a landmark in nature documentary filmmaking. It's also a charter mark of quality for just that HD DVD and Blu-ray can offer. A stunning release, it more than one sense, don't.
