It is important for an employer or employee to understand what impact an office environment can have. Anyone who comes from an office or similar based employment background will understand the importance of their Workstation Assessments. As an addition to above considerations, there are a number of other functions your workstation furniture needs to perform. There is wire housing and health and safety to consider, accessibility to your devices for when things go wrong storage to accommodate the computer peripherals that accompany your related devices, such as printer stands, projector brackets, disk stands etc. The furniture at your workstation needs to conform to country specific legislation for Workstation Assessments. It needs to be customizable and adjustable, not everybody is the same height, nor do they find the same seating positions and legroom comfortable. People also like to be in happy surroundings when spending many hours a day in the same place, a happy workplace increases productivity. This is why, the customizable aspect is important. A final consideration is security. Expensive equipment and confidential documentation will be stored within your workstation furniture, so you need to think about how to protect them. Computers and related equipment may be stored in lockable boxes, however, keep in mind that many of these devices need good air circulation to keep cool. Documentation may also be kept in safes or lockable storage units with easy access for directors.
